You should also bring extra food and water, warm clothing, and a whistle to signal for help. Using an outdoor survival kit requires knowledge and preparation. You should familiarise yourself with the tools in your kit and know how to use them. For example, you should know how to start a fire with a lighter or matches, use a compass and map to navigate, and use a knife or multi-tool to prepare food or build shelter. If the injury is serious, it's important to stay calm and seek help immediately. Use your whistle to signal for help or use your phone to call for emergency services. If you're in a remote area, you may need to hike out to get help or wait for rescuers to arrive. In the meantime, use your survival kit to manage the injury and stay warm and hydrated. Before creating or packing an outdoor survival kit, it's important to consider how many people will be sharing it. If you're going on a solo trip, you can pack a kit that's tailored to your needs.

However, if you're going with a group, you'll need to pack enough supplies for everyone. It's a good idea to discuss and plan ahead of time, and make sure each member of the group has their own basic survival kit, as well as sharing a larger kit that includes additional supplies like a larger shelter or cooking equipment. By considering how many people will be sharing the survival kit, you can ensure that everyone has what they need in case of an emergency.
